We often ask graduate students in history to “master the literature of a field,” meaning to be conversant with the main theoretical contours that give shape to historical investigation. What does “a field” look like, and by what methods might we discern the historiographic shape of a field? This presentation draws attention to my work in using data analytics to explore historiographic patterns in history journals, and how I use visualization as a way to give form to these patterns.